About The Course

This course will help both current and aspiring supervisors in developing and strengthening their supervisory skills. With the proper level of knowledge and competencies, supervisors can assist newer mental health professionals build their skills and preserve a higher level of professionalism in the field. This course is divided into four parts. To complete 15 hours of supervision required for new supervisors in California you will need to also complete the Integrative Developmental Model course.

- 1. The first part provides an overview of supervision and will review the role of a supervisor, expected competencies, and helpful/harmful characteristics of both the supervisor and supervisee.
- 2. The second part of this course provides a review of a benchmark law and ethics test that can be completed by new supervisees to help supervisors understand the supervisee's knowledge level and identify what additional support or training the supervisee will need. This section also includes an overview of documentation requirements and best practices in supervision.
- 3. Part three covers the art of giving feedback, with a focus on the importance of corrective/constructive feedback. Many supervisors experience difficulties in offering this type of feedback; however, research shows that it is highly valued by supervisees and it is necessary for their professional development.
- 4. The final section of this course will teach supervisors how to assist their supervisees identify and manage countertransference in their clinical relationships.
